Mr. Fulton explained to the court that he had no desire to go into the main facts bearing on the divorce proceedings, which were not at issue, but only to show that Mr. Wendenburg had probable cause for believing that Tyler was an available witness for Tenney, and that in due exercise of his position as Tenney's attorney, he had interviewed the witness, as was the common and accepted practice among attorneys in the preparation of their cases for trial.

Mr. Royall asserted that all of the talk of probable cause was a "sham and a pretense."

A counter statement from Walter Sharpe, of Norfolk, terving to attack Pannill's counter Statement from Walter Sharpe, of Norfolk, rerving to attack Pannill's reputation for veracity, developed a hot Norfolk political fight that had little bearing on the case in point. It seems that Pannill, an official of the Atlantic Bitulithic Company, was at one time a member of the Norfolk Board of Aldermen, and had refused to vote for Sharp as clerk of the board. Tyler in his evidence denied the stories of late suppers and wining and dining told by Pannill. He said he came to Richmond to inform Mrs. Teiney that Wendenburg was going to name him as a corespondent in the suit.

Professor Zueblin Says Traditions Should Not Interfere With Progress.

Speaking on the "City of the Future," before the Richmond Education Association in the John Marshall High School last night, Professor Charles Zueblin, of Boston, took as one of his examples the city of Harrisburg, Pa., which he held up as having been one of the most corrupt cities of the Enited States. "If they can redeem the capital of the State of Pennsylvania," he said, "what ought you not to do with the Gateway of the South" Richmond, he thought very much a modern city, in spile of its traditions. He found here, he said, a twentieth century hotel, twntieth century wotes of transportation and a twentieth century hotel, twntieth century wotes of transportation and a twentieth century hotel, twntieth century wotes of transportation and a twentieth century hotel, twntieth century wotes of the bear of the said, to have traditions kept in the historical libraries, so as to keep them from interfering with progress.

He told of the good things accomplished by other cities, and believed that to accomplish the greatest good all should take up the good things done by their contemporaries and strive to make model places in the way of good streets, good officials and adequate facilities.

I'tt costs no more to add artistic beauty and comfort in the construction of a city than to have it congested, commonplace and uninviting. All it needs is a prearranged plan, a reasonable outlay of energy and an eye to the artistic and beautiful. It is not necessary to house people in tenements and have public buildings scattered promisciously over a wide area to please gome small number of individuals who have personal prosperity in view. We are living in nineteenth century cities and towns, and we will continue in that way until the people realize the necessity of co-operation along lines of artistic unity. the cities of both ancient and modern times; no precenceived plans, just a hit-or-miss evolution, with no regard to the topography. Even if a city is built on a hill, or a collection of hills, in the valleys or on Western plains, the checkerboard arrangement sug-gested by William Penn when he de-signed Philadelphia is considered nec-essary.

Better to Build Well.

"Sordid business may be the start and much of the success of architecture and topographical improvement. There is no reason to build ugily business places. It is better to build well, for it has its return in dollars and cents. There should be an area for business, an area for manufacture and an area for the residential section. This accomplishment is possible with no extra effort or expense. Material and spiritual beauty may both strive in the twentieth century city. The ideal composite city's plan includes convenient and beautiful approaches by land or water; that is, a beautiful harbor, that your legs have ever seen.

"Boston was the first. Commissioners appointed faced unprecedented difficulties—a city of 500,000 people, surrounded by thirty suburbs, each independent of the other. To-day Boston, through the efforts of the park commissioners, led by Charles Eliot, son of Ex-President Eliot, of Harvard, has 17,000 acres of park space, compared with about 4,000 in Philadelphia and Chicago. Parks are everywhere.

"The most striking example of civic progress is that of Harrisburg. In the shadow of a Capitol building which was the scene of perhaps the most flagrant violations of the rights of the people, one woman, by persistent appeals, finally had a commission appointed to consider her plans.

"In five years Harrisburg has become a beautiful city, because the Harrisburg League for Municipal Improvement paid experts $5,000 to come and tell them what was the matter with it—and then followed their advice—and subsequently spent $5,000 more to elect the officials who were to carry out the $1,000,000 improvements.

"No city should be built except upon comprehensive plan provided beforeand. Those not so built should be could at whatever cost. Washington, one of the most beautiful cities in the world, was made possible by the cities forethought of L'Enfant. Now. after a century of haphazard growth, a government commission has returned to the original plan. The lesson is plain. In the next afty years many cities can and will be entirely rebuilt. Great avenues, starting from a civic centre will radiate fanilike to every quarter. The gridfron city will be a thing of the past. Civic improvements soon repay their costs. The city of Birmingham, Eng., took fifteen acres of slum property, sold half of it for a union station, and made the rest into parks and streets, and in seventy-five years the debt will be wiped out."
